was threatened by a number of its vessels. This fort is a strong position, on what is known as Bogne Island, and guards one of the most important inlets on the North Carolina coast, opposite the port of Beaufort. It is understood here, however, that the preparations for defence are complete, and that the enemy will have to encounter difficulties in any demonstration on this point, such as did not confront them at Hatteras.

News has also been received of the abandonment of Beacon Island and Oregon Inlet, on the Carolina coast. It is understood that the abandonment of these points became necessary on account of the seizure of Hatteras and the free ingress of the enemy to the Sounds.

The defences of Wilmington, Fort Macon, Newbern, and other points on the Carolina seaboard, is now a matter of urgent necessity. Volunteers, we learn, are We [they] are ordered to observe a strict being raised in the Eastern and Southern counties of North Carolina to defend the sea coast.
